Sometimes, and I’ve written this before, it’s tough to throw an opinion out there for readers to consume. There are times when you can write from an emotional, but safe place. When your memories are put on display and you kind of open yourself up through your words for others’ observation and consideration.

But there are also times when I find myself disappointed in those that live, shop, play, and volunteer around me.

This week was one of those times. And writing about that disappointment opens me up to ridicule or the “who does this guy think he is!” comments. Then I remember that, traditionally, news outlets had a responsibility to write about things that others were just talking about...or worse...not talking about. So is the case this week.

Earlier this year, the town was struck with the tragedy and reality of one of our youngsters trying to take their own life because of the pressure being put on them by other kids in the community. We can call it bullying, although. I think bullying has been present, literally, since we invented fire. It’s just in a fishbowl right now because of the progression of social media.

When that event happened, we watched the social media traffic of Pen City Current, as well as other traffic of our personal accounts. Most of the blame was laid squarely on the doorstep of the Fort Madison Community School District. There were not enough eyes and ears on the institution and hundreds and hundreds of people took to social media to express their concern and heartbreak for this family.

Behind the scenes, the district had already been taking steps to help students deal with the volatility of the behavior of our students and, honestly, parents, towards one another within the reach of the district.

Four school officials had permission to speak to the media. They expressed the need for the community to come together to support the students facing these issues. The community, we hope, will come together to support students as well as the district.

That’s when I tell myself, “Do something, even if it’s wrong!” I heard it from my dad.

There are two major projects I want to accomplish before snow flies, both of which I’ve been putting off. I want to insulate the chicken house, and I want to give the grass its final mowing. Mowing is a major project on our two-and-a-half-acre Empty Nest farm. I have a 60-inch deck on the John Deere but it still takes a full day to do the mowing and trimming.

If I had a zero-turn radius mower I know I could reduce the mowing time by half. Seeing how it’s November, I bet I could get a real good deal on one now. Parents, towards one another within the reach of the district.

Do something, even it’s wrong

If there’s one motto I’ve lived by all my life, and especially now that I’m a (ahem) “senior citizen” it is, “Do something, even if it’s wrong.” I often get caught up in the morning in the myriad things I want to accomplish. But first and foremost I need to get my 30 minutes of aerobic exercise in, then I need to do the chicken chores, then I need to shower, then I need to eat breakfast, then the phone rings and it’s the pharmacy reminding me of a prescription I need to pick up, then insurance appointment come in on the computer and I need to call the prospective clients and they’re not home so I leave a message, then “breaking news” appears on the television that captures my attention (usually a mass shooting), then Ginnie texts me to see how my morning is going and we do a “back-and-forth” for 15 minutes, then one of the prospective clients calls back to tell me they have to “think about it,” then some passerby on the highway pulls in and asks how much my metal pheasants are, then he has some idea for a rusty-metal sculpture he wants built and we spend half-an-hour drawing rough pencil sketches and b.s.‘ing, then he tells me he’ll have to “think about it.” I look at the clock and it’s 11:30, I haven’t accomplished a dang thing, and it’s time for lunch (dinner in the community)

That’s when I tell myself, “Do something, even if it’s wrong!” I have a 60-inch deck on the John Deere but it still takes a full day to do the mowing and trimming. If I had a zero-turn radius mower I know I could reduce the mowing time by half. Seeing how it’s November, I bet I could get a real good deal on one of those fancy, zero-turn radius mowers. dealer and spend a half an hour figuring out how to use the voice message feature. I tell myself that if I don’t hear immediately back from the dealer (he’ll never figure out the voice recording), I’ll interpret it as a sign that I don’t need a new mower. I don’t hear immediately back. Ahh.

I have to get that hen house patched up and insulated before the cold wind starts blowing. There are gaping holes in the north wall and I need to set bales of straw around the foundation. What to do first? Stop it! Do something, even if it’s wrong!

I go to town and get the insulation. That shoots a day. It’s too cold and windy to do anything more. The second day, I patch the holes on the north side of the chicken house and place bales of straw around the foundation.

That’s enough for the second day.

On the third day, a Saturday, Ginnie and I watch the Iowa/Ohio State and Iowa State/West Virginia football games that come on at the same time, different networks. I spend an hour trying to figure out the split-screen feature on the television. I give up and decide to switch back and forth. Iowa upsets Ohio State and Iowa State is embarrassed by West Virginia. Excitement and disappointment clashing together leaves me feeling—uh, blank. And I have accomplished nothing.

On the fourth day I pull the guts out of the chicken house so I can hang insulation on the west wall. The chickens are beside themselves with curiosity and are a nuisance underfoot. I uncover a mouse nest and the chickens go berserk catching mice. Hilarious!

Then the mower dealer texts back (he figured out the voice message after all) and says he has a real good deal on a zero-turn radius mower and he will deliver. Dear God, do I stop everything to play with a new toy? No, a job started is a job worth finishing (also, from my dad). I text the dealer back, “I’ll think about it.” I finish hanging insulation. The chickens seem to think they are owed the warmth and comfort of a newly insulated hen house and show no appreciation whatsoever.

Unannounced, the dealer shows up all smiles pulling the new zero-turn radius mower on a trailer. It’s a beauty. He starts it up and backs it off the trailer. I give it a spin around the barnyard. It turns on a dime. It starts to spit snow.

The dealer looks at me, I look at him. He says, “Do something, even if it’s wrong, Curtis.” I pull out my checkbook. Have a good story?

Becoming informed is the task of those uninformed attended a National School Safety Conference with the goal of finding answers that would specifically address those concerns and they came back with a program that probably is as good of an investment (at a mere $2,200 per year for the entire district) in our students’ protection as they could have ever found.

It was reported in several media outlets, including our own, that the new reporting app and online reporting system was very soon coming online. But the district wanted to hold meetings with the school, the students, and the community to roll out the program correctly and bring everyone into the program prior to it going live on November 30. So FMHS Assistant Principal Pat Lamb sent out alerts on the FMHS Power system, which includes voicemail and texts, to all parents registered in the district to let them know of two meetings being held on Tuesday and Wednesday of this past week.

A grand total of three (3) parents showed up for those meetings. Three. It’s an assumption to be sure, but it would seem that people aren’t really deeply interested in solving the problems that face our children, and our students. I don’t buy at all that they didn’t know about it. If a parent or family in the district honestly says they weren’t aware of the meetings, it would beg the question. How could you not?

It was reported in several media outlets. The school alerted every parent via text and voicemail. If you didn’t get that information, it’s really alarming that we aren’t paying attention to alerts coming from the district and we’re only reacting to tragedy when it unfolds. So…we all want to throw daggers but no one wants to help prevent the war.

PCC did another story after the first one.
