City to take second look at LCEDG funding

Councilman says city could take money from lower priority projects to help fund LCEDG

FORT MADISON - A discrepancy in interpretation of the City of Fort Madison's commitment to the county's economic development efforts resulted in a vibrant discussion between city officials and representatives of the Lee County Economic Development Group Tuesday.

Fort Madison City Manager David Varley put the issue on the agenda of Tuesday's regular City Council meeting and recommended that the city make a contribution to the LCEDG, but left it to the council to determine what amount was appropriate.

In a memo to the city council last week, Varley wrote that the city had a three-year commitment that ended in June. He recommended that the city make a contribution to the LCEDG, but said revenues are about $800,000 less than when the commitment was made and the city has to be responsible to its citizens in setting the contribution.

The issue was eventually tabled on a motion by Councilman Chris Greenwald who said he'd like to have conversations with city staff to find where the city might find some money.

"There's some things that we fund that I think aren't as important as this," Greenwald said. "I'd like to table this because I don't want to spring this on David now. I want to give him my thoughts on perhaps things that we're supporting that aren't as important."

Greenwald also encouraged other councilman to look at options the city's funding that are less imp-

FORT MADISON - City officials have approved a new personnel manual that redefines employee benefits for city employees.

At Tuesday's regular meeting of the Fort Madison City Council, the council voted 6-1 to approve the modified handbook that outlines changes to non-union employee benefits. City staff had been working on the changes since Iowa laws changed stripping bargaining rights from city workers. The Fort Madison Police Department and Fort Madison Fire Departments are still covered by union contracts.

Tracy Leone, a business agent out of the Quad Cities for Teamsters 238, was on hand at the meeting representing the city's library and water department employees.

Leone told the council that 2017's Chapter 20 overhaul amounted to union busting, but said the council and city administration had "a wide berth to direct its bargaining representative to retain many permissible subjects that were in previous contracts."

She said it has been difficult for the employees during the transition to the handbook that was effective July 1.

"Here we are 52 days later, finally voting on the handbook that spells out the working conditions of the people who keep our water safe to drink and our libraries welcoming places for all," Leone said.

FMHS trades students get back to work on new stadium press box

FORT MADISON - With school ready to open, a group of about 14 building trades students will have a "large" task awaiting them.

Inside the workshop of Fort Madison High School building trades instructor Clint Kobelt, is two large sections of the new press box that will go up on visitor's side of Richmond Stadium, hopefully by the Sept. 21 home game against Solon.

"We've got 14 kids in two sessions that have 18 days to get this disassembled, reassembled and in place at the football field," Kobelt said Wednesday morning.

Last year's trade's class framed up the press box in the last four weeks of the school year and the project was used as the students final exam. In addition to building the press boxes, the students in Kobelt's classes also did the rough construction on the Habitat for Humanity homes that will be dedicated on Thursday.

Fort Madison building trades instructor Clint Kobelt stands next to the two parts of the new FMHS visitor's side press box. The two pieces were built by FMHS students in the last four weeks of the past school year and now another group of students is trying to get the new facility in place by Sept. 21.

City to dig for LCEDG funds

portant than economic development.

LCEDG CEO Joe Steil said it was his understanding that the city's commitment to LCEDG was a five-year commitment that began in 2014-15, which would leave one more year on the commitment. The city committed to $50,000 per year, but when the revenues from the riverboat casinos dried up at the end of the 2017 fiscal year, the city decided to cut their contributions back to $25,000 the following year.

Steil said he would like the city to eventually return to its original commitment of the $50,000, but understood that budgets can be confining and governmental agencies have to look at things annually.

Varley said his records indicated the city's contribution was for three years and the city's revenue picture is not as robust as it was when the original commitment was made.

The LCEDG is also finalizing plans on its next five-year public-private partnership campaign to extend funding through fiscal year 2023. That campaign kicks off in September.

"After hearing you speak, I almost feel like you're on the attack here," Greenwald said. "When you say "We're doing a great job" - well if you're doing such a great job then my tax base is growing and I've got no problem. But when you do a good job what you do is you hook 'em, and then you get them to us and we have to incentivize the heck out of it," Greenwald said.

Greenwald said LCEDG said the city's through about $5 million over the past two years in expansion incentives and maybe the city should be looking closer at those investments.

"I feel like I haven't been listening to David Varley like I should have been listening to David Varley," he said. Steil said it was not his intention to make the council feel attacked.

"In no way shape or form is this to be an attack and I'm sorry if you misinterpreted that," Steil said. "We're all about expansion and those companies are here and we want to make sure we are there for them when they are talking about expansion. We do need to take care of those businesses because they are committed. When we get somebody new that's the glitzy stuff." Mayor Brad Randolph said economic development has value and the city doesn't have the capabilities that the LCEDG has in order to sustain and improve the workforce.

"The question is at what value is that, No. 1. And the question before that is can we afford it," Randolph said.

Varley told Steil that the city is down about $834,000 less than when riverboat revenues were coming in.

"We were getting about $300,000 a year from the riverboat and when that floated away 100% of that money floated away with it. We were giving you $50,000 but we're $834,000 lower in revenue than we were then," Varley said. "You say you'd like to go back to that same level - well we've got city department budgets that would like to go back to that level as well." Varley told Steil he couldn't see telling city departments to cut their budgets back so the city could increase their commitment to LCEDG.

"I'm a little offended by that," Greenwald said. "I'm a little offended when the LCEDG does not commit. When we get money from the LCEDG we have to make sure we are there for them when they are talking about expansion. We do need to take care of those businesses because they are committed. When we get somebody new that's the glitzy stuff." Mayor Brad Randolph said economic development has value and the city doesn't have the capabilities that the LCEDG has in order to sustain and improve the workforce. Mr. Varley, LCEDG COO said LCEDG officials would be willing to sit with city officials on a more regular basis and let them see the group's budget gets in order to increase transparency between the two groups. Fraise also spoke about the group's efforts to create a better workforce saying that many industries in the county are poised for growth, but are concerned about a sustainable workforce. He cited state and national awards the LCEDG has received in the past two years because of their focus on programming for workforce development. LCEDG gets 51% of its funding from the county, which according to Steil is approximately $210,000 per year. The rest of it's revenue comes from contributions from private industry and contributions from the cities of Fort Madison and Keokuk. Fort Madison makes its contribution directly, however, Keokuk's contribution comes through the Keokuk Economic Development Corp. as a pass through from a check from the city. Varley said he would put the issue back on the agenda for the next city council meeting.

The biggest challenge is that the students are coming in and taking over where the other students left off. So it comes down to how well did the students communicate the message to this year. The disassembly print... the reassembly print... how things are all labeled, numbered and coded," Kobelt said. He said he has a morning and an afternoon trades class so he'll get 2.5 hours in the morning and again in the afternoon. He said the coordination between the two will be critical in taking the box apart and re-assembling it.

"To address that, I've brought in a senior, Elon Kruse, who's entered the program early and is just a standout guy and we created a position where he comes in as the site manager and Huffman Welding & Machine cut the bleachers on both sides and reconfigured the stands to allow for the larger press box.

The new box will have corrugated steel siding in a crimson and white color scheme.

"The concession stand footprint itself is bigger than the previous press box. It's basically 12'x30' and it's a two-story structure, but on top of the second story will have a wall on the front and people can do film and video there.

The press box will have two concession service windows on the football field side of the facility. The second story will have slide windows.

"The biggest challenge is that the students are coming in and taking over where the other students left off. So it comes down to how well did the students communicate the message to this year. The disassembly print... the reassembly print... how things are all labeled, numbered and coded," Kobelt said.

He said he has a morning and an afternoon trades class so he'll get 2.5 hours in the morning and again in the afternoon. He said the coordination between the two will be critical in taking the box apart and re-assembling it.

"To address that, I've brought in a senior, Elon Kruse, who's entered the program early and is just a standout guy and we created a position where he comes in as the site manager for the project," Kruse said. "To make the hill just a little steeper, the goal is have this functional by Sept. 21, so they've got 18 school days to get this out there. It won't be finished, but it will be functional. Concessions won't be operational, but it needed to be functional space in 18 working days in 2.5 hours a day in each class." Kobelt said the deadline is absolutely doable, but he said that's why all the students working on the project had to be in advanced classes to get the job done.

"That would have been a bridge too far to travel," Kobelt said.

Mohrfeld Electric will be putting in the electrical work, but the students will install the windows and continue working on finishing the project in the fall.
We’ll be happy to help you polish up your smile so you can share it with the world.

New handbook has benefit gains, reductions

She recognized the city had kept some of the benefits from the contract in the new handbooks, but pointed out several reductions in benefits including sick leave accrual, sick leave compensation, shift differential pay, funeral leave, and health insurance. The plan also provides for $10/month in increased longevity pay, increases in certification pay, increases in winter wear and safety shoe reimbursement, CDL pay and a base wage increase of 2.5% for distribution and plant employees, according to Leone.

The sick leave accrual cash out language changes the amount of sick leave allowed to be accrued from 600 to 250 hours. Leone pointed out there are current city employees who are close to retirement who were banking those hours for a payout and that money would be used to help pay for the cost of retirement until they are eligible for Medicaid. She said that change will impact employees retirement plans and could impact their health coverage.

An employee making $20/hour lost $7,000 if they had at least 600 hours of sick leave accrued on their retirement date with the changes in the handbook.

City Councilman Chad Cangas said he had a problem with making that change. “I feel like that a stroke of a pen we’re taking that away from people that might be counting on it. I’d like to see with making that change.

There are several employees with over 20 years in water and two in library who do have over 20 years,” said city finance director Peggy Steffenmeier.

“That really isn’t meant to pay for health insurance. Although I think that was the intention when it was put in there, but it was never spelled out.”

City Manager David Varley said people shouldn’t rely on buyouts and payouts as revenue for retirement. He said people need to better utilize their retirement funds and keep an eye on costs to make adjustments as they move closer toward retirement age.

“Every year when there was bargaining, employees get more pay, more benefits. To pick one item out and say I was banking on this when I got hired, ok, then look at all the other benefits you got every single year that you weren’t banking on when you got hired because you didn’t have them when you were hired. If you use buy out of vacation and sick leave, and things like that, it can put you in a world of financial trouble.”

Cangas said if he were in the situation of a retiring city employee, he would be upset with the change. “I got hired, ok, then look at all the other options. to pick one item out and say I was banking on this when I get hired, I’d be mad.” Larry Driscoll, director of public works said employees were offered retirement prior to making the changes and those employees didn’t retire. But councilman Bob Morawitz said the issue isn’t about early retirement options.

“This isn’t about early retirement, it’s about regular retirement. If someone was banking on that money being there and you say, ‘No, it’s not’ – that’s not right,” Morawitz said.

Morawitz motioned to amend the section on sick leave hours to exempt any employee that was hired before July 31, 2008 and restore the 600 hours to those employees,然而 the motion failed for lack of a second.

Randolph then called for the vote on the handbook. Cangas abstained from voting on the issue and Morawitz voted against the handbook changes.

In other action, the council: voted 8-0 to approve Ashley Balmer and Hugh Vande-Griff to the City Parks board with terms expiring March 31, 2018.
