After the mud - A look back at the 2018 rodeo

Sometimes you had to look twice. The people that you usually see around town, in whatever setting, looked just a bit different. In my business you see people in suits, or medical scrubs, or the crimson and black of Bloodhounds sports and the blue and white of Holy Trinity Catholic.

But this past week they were in plaid and I had to do double takes to say "Hello". I've never been any sort of cowboy and I think I owned a cowboy hat once as a kid when it came with the plastic guns and handcuffs all cellophaned in a package that hung from a K-mart peg rack.

The 71st annual Tri-State Rodeo wrapped yesterday with a big crowd - on dry bleachers - complete with the skyfall of Bobby Reid. Due to this Gordon fell sitting over the central plains for about four days, rain kept Reid from his appointed delivery of the American Flag from the skies above C.E. "Eddie" Richards Arena, but Saturday he got the jump. And I got the picture.

The day started with the annual Rodeo Parade that ran for about two hours, down Avenue G and through historic downtown Fort Madison. I stumbled upon a family from Colorado where two of the youngest were snugged up under a blanket while the oldest were snug and gnarled, and fit together in an “S” pattern. They did indeed look painful. I doubted whether the copper had any real effect.

Fast forward to today when I was having my annual check-up. The doctor asked if there were any problems. I had prepared for this question and told the doctor that my left elbow hurt. He checked my elbow, applying pressure here and there, and told me to get an elastic bandage here and there, and told me to get an elastic bandage. He held his hand out in front of me, flexed his fingers, then spread them apart in a fan formation. His fingers were bent and gnarled, and fit together in an “S” pattern. They did indeed look painful. I doubted whether the copper had any real effect.

"When I was a kid my father ran a gas station in Monroe. I loved "helping" my father with his business. I swept the floor and washed windshields—albeit I had to stand on a five-gallon bucket in order to reach the windshields. Mostly, I drank pop and ate Cherry Mesh candy bars.

Farmers would come into the gas station, sit down in the chairs and empty grain out of the cuffs of their bib overalls, which I would then sweep up. One old farmer, I noticed, had a thick strand of copper wire around his wrist. It was crudely fashioned, probably with the use of pliers he carried in the side pocket of his bibs. I wished I had a pair of pliers like that. Being a nosy kid, I asked the farmer what the copper wire was for. He told me he had arthritis in his fingers and the copper relieved the pain. He held his hand out in front of me, flexed his fingers, then spread them apart in a fan formation. His fingers were bent and gnarled, and fit together in an “S” pattern. They did indeed look painful. I doubted whether the copper had any real effect.

Knowing he had me, the vendor said, "Oh, yes. It's for arthritis."

"As a matter of fact, I do," I told him. "My doctor actually prescribed copper as a pain reliever."

When Ginnie and I were in Colorado this summer, we ran across a roadside jewelry stand. My elbow was acting up that day, probably from the altitude. Figuring it wouldn't hurt to ask, I inquired if the vendor had any copper bracelets. His eyes lit up as he pointed to a case of rather attractive silver and copper Navajo jewelry. I liked the looks of this jewelry immediately. He pulled out a couple of bracelets and asked, “Got arthritis?”

"As a matter of fact, I do," I told him. "My doctor actually prescribed copper as a pain reliever."

Knowing he had me, the vendor said, "Oh, yes. It's been known for years that copper reduces pain. No one knows for sure why, and it might be psychological. But if it works, who cares?"

Copper bracelet is effective arthritis home remedy

He slipped a copper and silver bracelet onto my wrist. I really liked the looks of it. “If it turns your skin green,” the vendor continued, “don’t wash it off. It just indicates that the healing quality of the copper is working its way into your skin.”

I reached for my credit card. Ginnie pulled hers out first and said, “You’ve got a birthday coming up. My treat.”

That was in July. It is now September and I’m glad to report that the pain in my left elbow, after wearing the copper bracelet continuously, is, and I’m going to go out on a limb here (get it?), reduced by 75%. Psychological or not, the pain has lessened to a tolerable level—not gone completely, mind you, but minimized considerably. Yes, my wrist is a little green, but I can carry a bucket of water out to the chickens with the left arm and not have to switch arms halfway there.

Simply amazing—no expensive arthritis medication, no elastic bandage, just a good old-fashioned home remedy. By the way, when I wear bib overalls, I carry a pair of pliers in the side pocket. Ginnie has to rescue them from the dryer.

to the recently added corn stalks along Main Street. Beck and Jace Dunkins, from Glenwood, Colo., were visiting with their parents and grandparents Randy and Bev Schiller, who now live in Basalt, Colorado.

Bev and Randy grew up in Fort Madison and wanted to bring their grandchildren back for their first rodeo. “We used to go to the rodeo every day when we were little kids,” Bev said. “I remember when Fess Parker used to be out here and he would stay and walk the grounds every night.”

She was referring to the Fess Parker, of Davy Crockett fame. For those to young to remember when television was black and white and came in box the size of a cedar chest with the screen the size of today’s microwaves.

Bev said the kids went to the Thursday night rodeo, and even though it was a little wet, they had a magnificent time and may make it annual trek.

Both Jace and Beck said their favorite moment was the family of horses that get introduced at the end of the rodeo. If you weren’t at the Lil’ Spurs Rodeo Monday, you may not have known that.

A ramped up pack of hand geeks in front of Dodd Printing & Stationery jumped up and down calling for “MUUUUUSIIIIC!” and waved large yellow score cards with “10” printed on them as the Bloodhounding Band, the Fort Madison Middle School Band, and bands from Quincy and Central Lee moved down the street. It wasn’t hard to see why that group got a band to stop in front of them and put on a show.

“Shoeless” the clown, a.k.a. Gregg Brockman, tooled around on his retro-scooter high-living kids and encircling parade entrees.

Back out at the arena Saturday night reminded me of an Orca shows at the bigger zoos. All the fans in the front two or three rows had plastic tarps or ponchos or raingoes to keep mud flying from racing livestock from getting on their faces. Some just didn’t care. It was a rodeo.

Heather Postin and Sara Bay sat in the front of section 550...in the front with just a couple of Coors Lights on the wall from blocking a few of the splatters. I was shooting the steer wrestling and turned to see these two girls almost begging for more.

Postin said they were from Cuba, Illinois, but her mother is from Fort Madison and was actually working on her face at the rodeo. Bay was celebrating her birthday...with mud on her face at the rodeo.

After Master of Ceremony’s Boyd Polhamus, brought the curtain down on the rodeo, crews went to work on getting the stage ready for Jake Owens, the final act of the year. Fans gathered near the grounds entry gates around the stadium to run out into, what can only be described as about six inches of wet mud, to get a good place to ‘sink’ and watch the show.

About 15 minutes after the rodeo ended, the gates opened and people, almost beyond belief, went running onto the grounds kicking up the taut mess that I think is best described as resembling wet concrete before it hardens. One person, I honestly couldn’t tell if it was a man or woman because they were covered in mud, buffed in the soppy mess on the way out. There’s no way...that wasn’t going to happen.

The crowd stuck around for the most part for the show, but most decided to stay in their seats to listen and watch the popular national country act. I had a jack and coke with some family and looked under the brims to say “Hi” to people I really just didn’t recognize.

Joy Main, of Fort Madison, gives the Quincy High School Marching band a 10 on Saturday morning outside Dodd Printing & Stationery.

Committee responded well to the week’s rainy days
