City proposes new lease with RiverFest

City didn’t discuss new fees, deposit with organizer

FORT MADISON – Under a new proposed lease with the city, RiverFest organizer Charles Craft will pay 1,500% more to use Riverview Park for the burgeoning summer festival.

The 1,500% amounts to $375 for the year. Craft was paying just $25 to the city for the rental of the park for the four-day event for the past three years. Under the new contract, Craft will pay $400 for the park.

The city and Craft have been working on a lease agreement for use of the park. City Manager David Varley told the Fort Madison Parks Board at its meeting on Wednesday night, that the proposed agreement is a one-year deal.

“We’re asking you to approve this as a one-year agreement with the intent that in 2020 the parties would enter into a multi-year agreement,” Varley said.

The board approved the agreement with a 4-0 vote. Craft said Wednesday he didn’t have a problem with the increased fee, but said he would have liked to have seen the lease before the park board approved it.

“I’ve been asking (Varley) for a lease agreement since October. I’ve stopped in to see it several times and they tell me it’s not ready or it’s close to being ready. Then, almost overnight, it shows up in front of us,” Craft said.

Razing draws ire of city’s historic commission

BY CHUCK VANDENBERG
PCC EDITOR

FORT MADISON – The demolition of a house at 1301 Avenue I has the ire of the city’s Historic Preservation Commission.

The property was demolished sometime during the three-day holiday weekend and Andy Andrews, president of the North Lee County Historical Society, told the Fort Madison City Council the move was a slap in the face of the commission.

“It was a real slap into the face of the HPC yesterday when they came in on a holiday and tore down an 1836 brick house at 1301 Avenue I. There was no knowledge to the preservation commission,” Andrews told the council Tuesday night.

Andrews spent some time outlining the history of the building and said there was some hardware the commission would have like to have saved.

“Unknown to us, this was being torn down and we kept this all secret from the Historic Preservation Commission.”

He presented a list of homes built before 1960 and said those homes should have a demolition permit.

“Of course, the city’s going to tell me they don’t have to agree with the HPC’s decision,” Andrews said.

City says property has been a nuisance for years get demolition permits, but that’s really not designated. The commission is here to preserve our historic structures,” Andrews said.

Andrews said the commission tried to purchase the property, but there were too many hoops to jump through. He said the commission has agreed to tear down some buildings including 721 Avenue G, so he didn’t know why 1301 was chosen so quickly. “The demolition of 1301 I was a blatant disregard to the Historic Preservation Commission. Wanted to bring that to your attention tonight and hopefully we can get this resolved so the Historic Preservation Commission feels like they serve a purpose here in town.”

The city has owned the property since it received it on a quit claim deed in February of 2017 from the county on sheriff’s sale.

Andrews confirmed that he never did take possession of the property. He said the commission used to get demolition permit information on properties that were being torn down in the city, but according to City Building Director Doug Krogmeier, nothing ever came of the sale and the property stayed with the city.

After the meeting, Rusty Andrews was at the Historic Preservation Commission meeting to bring this to your attention and hopefully we can get this resolved so the Historic Preservation Commission feels like they serve a purpose here in town.”

Andrews son, Rusty, who sits on the council, made a pitch to the council for the property in the summer of 2017, but according to City Building Director Doug Krogmeier, nothing ever came of the sale and the property stayed with the city.

Steffensmeier tapped for Goldman-Sachs program

ANKENY – Jenny Steffensmeier, owner of Steffensmeier Welding & Manufacturing in Pilot Grove, is one of two area businesswoman selected to participate in the first Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses program in Iowa.

Steffensmeier is one of 37 scholars from 20 Iowa counties ranging from Iowa’s largest city to towns with a population of under 1,000. They represent a diverse range of business and industry including restaurants, architecture, professional services and healthcare.

“Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses is offered for free as a philanthropic investment to help small business entrepreneurs create growth, jobs and economic opportunity across the country – or in this case, across Iowa from the Missouri River to the Mississippi River,” said Katherine Jollon Colsher, National Director of Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses.

“Des Moines Area Community College and Iowa’s entire community college system is proud to partner with Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses to offer Iowans access to this free, exceptional curriculum developed by Babson College said DMACC President Dr. Rob Denson. “Small business is the backbone of Iowa’s economy. In seeing the high level of interest from applicants and the high-caliber of scholars selected, it’s clear that Iowa was the right choice for this statewide offering of Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses.”

The class will last for three months, with scholars taking a blend of in-classroom and online learning. The classes cover everything from identifying growth opportunities, refining operations processes, marketing and selling, understanding and using financial statements and leadership training. Business owners who have taken the program sometimes call it a real-world MBA – where small business owners focus on growing their business, using their own business as a case study.

Since the inception of Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses, the national program has been a tremendous success. Sixty-seven percent of alumni report increased revenues six months after graduating, 47 percent report hiring employees during the same time period, and nearly 88 percent of graduates do business with one another.

Those eligible for the program have been in business for at least two years, have at least $100,000 in revenue, and have at least two employees, including the business owner.

Ann March, of Bark & Play Daycare and Suites in West Burlington was also selected to participate in the program.

the board,” Craft said.

“It’s not the dollar amount in the lease, I think that’s a fair amount to pay. It’s the precedent that it sets. Are we encouraging people to do things in the community or discouraging them. This seems discouraging to me. It’s patently geared toward us and not anyone else that uses the park.”

Varley said at the meeting he had spoken with Craft about the new lease, but not about the new rates.

Craft has also paid a utility bill for the festival to the city for electricity and water used based on city analysis of usage during the four days. This year Craft said the festival may provide their own electrical service and metering.

The city has also added a $1,000 deposit for utilities and Craft said he was unaware of any requests for a deposit.

He said for the past three years he received large electrical bills. With the carnival providing their own electricity through generators, he wasn’t sure how the bills were being assessed.

The festival this year runs Aug. 1-4. The RiverFest Reveal Party is March 2 at Kinnick South where this year’s entertainment lineup will be announced, along with ticket giveaways and other promotions.

In other action, the board;

• voted to allow Rodeo Park roadways to remain open year round during regular park hours.
• discussed the rehabbing or demolishing of the pressbox at Victory Field
• approved a new park shelter agreement. The new agreement holds rental rates the same, but eliminates some of the shelter houses that need to be rented. The others will be first-come, first serve. Those shelters include: Johnson Shelter in Central Park, Ivanhoe Shelter, and all Rodeo Park Shelters with the exception of Old Lions’ Shelter, which still requires rental.

12 Plus graduate Michael Mosena commented “12 Plus introduced us to some of these companies and we now know people at Pinnacle and Silgan, but it was good to hear from companies we haven’t seen before about opportunities too.”

“It’s important to let students know there’s a lot to industrial maintenance,” said Lee County EDG Economic Development Program Director Dana Millard. “The skills the students are learning apply to companies not only across the region but across the country and with the increase in automation are in very high demand.”
